

Thinking Through Quality Questioning

"KEDC... Leading Tomorrow. Today."

Questioning has long been recognized as an essential tool for effective teaching and learning. Explore Thinking Through Quality Questioning (text for the session) and its research-based framework that organizes the core components of questioning. Practice collaboratively writing, editing, and polishing questions based on five criteria. Learn strategies and tools for scaffolding student thinking in response to a question. Investigate norms to help create a classroom culture that encourages student thinking. Participate in thinking routines that engage ALL in responding to questions—and reflect on how you might implement selected ones in the classroom to facilitate thinking and response-ability for learning. Finally, commit to the use of one or more strategies in a classroom setting.

Session facilitators will be Jackie Walsh and Beth Sattes, developers of QUILT (Questioning and Understanding to Improve Learning and Thinking) and authors of three recent books on quality questioning. Walsh and Sattes work with teachers and administrators across the country to improve questioning, teaching, and learning.

Learning Targets

1. To explore the connections between classroom questioning and student thinking and learning
2. To make meaning of a framework for quality questioning and apply it to my students' learning and my personal practice
3. To identify specific strategies, protocols, and other practices that I would like to transfer back to my classroom, school, or district
4. To develop expectations for student responsibilities in questioning, thinking, and learning
5. To assess questioning practices in my classroom, school, and/or district, and create 2-3 goals for working with other teachers to improve student learning through quality questioning
